The National Volunteers were run by a 3-member Supreme Committee of the National Council.

In 1913, Moore was appointed inspector-general with the provisional committee of the National Volunteers in the Ogilvy and Wallace office and soon on the original Ogilvy's building. A temporary headquarters was established in the basement of the new building, now known as the Ogilvy Block. The headquarters was on the fourth floor of the Ogilvy Block from January 1913 to April 1915. Fersditch Street, from 16 South Ogilvy to the back of the building, was known as the Ogilvy Block.

The National Volunteers were run by a 3-member Supreme Committee of the National Council, with the same basis as the Territorial Army. The purpose of the Territorial Army was to provide a reserve of trained soldiers in case of war. The National Volunteers were intended to provide a similar reserve of trained volunteers in case of need. However, the volunteers were not trained to the same extent as the Territorial Army and were not expected to fight in a war. The volunteers were used for local defense duties, such as helping to put out fires or responding to emergencies.

The National Volunteers specified in their report, however, have met with considerable difficulties and have indicated that the provision of funds and facilities is insufficient to meet the needs of the Volunteers. The report states that the Volunteers have requested additional funds to cover the cost of equipment, clothing, and transportation. The volunteers also reported that they have faced difficulties in obtaining the necessary training and support from the authorities.

The Irish Sword
The National Volunteers were also mobilized to ensure an efficient and effective mobilization of the available human resources for defense purposes. This was achieved through the implementation of strategic plans and coordination with local authorities. The volunteers were responsible for defending the city against any potential threats and ensuring the safety of the population. Their efforts were crucial in maintaining the security and stability of the region during the challenging times.
This image is in fact most pictures from the camera of the Daily British Post of January 1915. It shows the exterior of the Rising’s Dublin Castle, which was attacked on Easter Monday morning. The photograph depicts the Rising’s volunteers, some of whom were killed in the attack. The text continues:

"In the summer of 1915 the Dublin Rising continued to function from county to county. The Irish Republican Army continued to fight. The Volunteers continued to take part in the fighting. The Rising was not over."

This text is from a historical account of the Easter Rising in Ireland.
Dublin After the Six Days’ War

With the National Volunteers

The most important service rendered by the National Volunteers was to end the insurrection.

In Cork, Waterford, Dunlavin, and Ennisberry, provisional military headquarters were opened to the authorities. In Dublin, military headquarters were opened to the authorities. The National Volunteers were not involved in any way with the authorities.
